Born in England, Warner emigrated to New Zealand in 1934 and began teaching in Maori schools. She was deeply concerned about the high illiteracy rates among Maori children and became determined to find a way to help them learn to read and write.

Warner's Key Principles

Warner's teaching methods were based on three key principles:

1. Children learn best when they are actively engaged in their own learning.
2. Every child is unique and has their own individual learning style.
3. Teachers should create a supportive and nurturing learning environment.

Warner put these principles into practice by creating a highly individualized approach to teaching. She used a variety of methods, including:

- Word walls
- Writing workshops
- Storytelling
- Dramatic play
- Outdoor learning

Warner's methods proved to be highly effective. Maori students who were taught using her methods made significant gains in their literacy skills. Warner's work also had a major impact on the broader New Zealand education system, helping to bring about a more progressive and child-centered approach to teaching.

Warner's Legacy

Sylvia Ashton Warner's legacy continues to inspire educators around the world. Her innovative teaching methods are still used in many classrooms today. She is also remembered for her passionate advocacy for Maori education and her belief in the potential of every child.

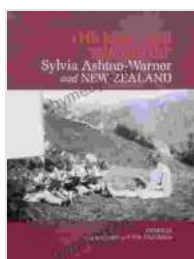

Warner was a visionary educator who made a lasting contribution to the field of education. She is an inspiration to all who believe in the power of teaching and the importance of giving every child the opportunity to succeed.

"Every child is an artist. The problem is how to remain an artist once we grow up." - Sylvia Ashton Warner
