The Causes of the Dust Bowl

The Dust Bowl was caused by a combination of factors, including drought, poor farming practices, and overgrazing. The drought began in the early 1930s, and it lasted for several years. During this time, the Great Plains received far less rainfall than normal. The lack of rain caused the soil to become dry and loose. When the wind blew, it picked up the soil and carried it away in great clouds of dust.

Poor farming practices also contributed to the Dust Bowl. Many farmers plowed up the native grasslands and planted crops that were not suited to the dry climate. This left the soil vulnerable to erosion. Overgrazing by livestock also damaged the land. The animals ate the vegetation that held the soil in place, and this made the soil even more vulnerable to erosion.
