The Valencia was a wooden-hulled steamship that was built in 1891. The ship was 250 feet long and 40 feet wide, and it had a capacity of 1,500 tons. The Valencia was powered by a single steam engine, and it had a top speed of 12 knots.

The Valencia was on a voyage from Seattle, Washington, to Nome, Alaska, when it was caught in a fierce storm. The storm was so severe that the ship's engines failed, and the ship was blown off course. The Valencia eventually ran aground on a reef near the town of Port Alexander, Alaska.

The passengers and crew of the Valencia were forced to abandon ship. They boarded lifeboats and rowed to shore. The weather was so bad that many of the lifeboats capsized, and many people drowned.

Those who survived the shipwreck were stranded on the beach. They were cold, wet, and hungry. They had no food or water, and they were surrounded by wolves. The survivors eventually built a fire and huddled together for warmth.

The survivors were eventually rescued by the US Coast Guard. The Coast Guard sent a ship to Port Alexander, and the survivors were taken to safety. The rescue of the Valencia survivors is one of the most legendary in American history.
